Malta's first steps of transition to BIM were concentrated on applying the BIM methodology to the construction industry. This was done through the Ministry of Environment and Energy, the Malta Quality Institute and the Maltese Engineers Council. The main characteristic of the BIM in the North EU countries is the early involvement of the relevant stakeholders in the project. In Malta, the BIM process is still at its initial stages. The main problem is the lack of awareness and knowledge about BIM among the majority of the professionals involved in the construction industry. The lack of knowledge and experience in the use of BIM has led to a lack of interest in the use of BIM. This is due to the fact that the majority of the professionals involved in the construction industry are not familiar with the concept of BIM and its benefits. The programmatic design of a system and its management can be considered as a process of continuous improvement and evolution. This is achieved by identifying the strengths and weaknesses of the system, and then taking corrective actions to address them. The following diagram illustrates the iterative nature of the process:
